THE TBRI PODCAST:

SENSORY HEALING AFTER DEVELOPMENTAL TRAUMA WITH MARTI SMITH

Marti Smith is an occupational therapist (OT) that authored Sensory Healing After Developmental Trauma. The book provides information on effects of trauma on the sensory systems (pulling from TBRI and Dr. Bruce Perry's research, among others), as well as on sensory healing, including free or low-cost activity ideas. The book's design allows readers to skip to topics that are of greatest concern; for example, if a child is having difficulty with sleep, the reader can skip right to the sleep section and explore those specific activities.

A few big takeaways from this episode (aside from how amazingly helpful Marti's book sounds!) include:

- Co-regulation (which includes being in the presence of a regulated, safe, trusted other) ALWAYS comes before self-regulation, developmentally. Children, specifically those who struggle with emotion and/or physical regulation, NEED co-regulation. We, as adults, so often still use co-regulation, as well!
- "Activity analysis" (an OT term) can be used in daily life to help children break down difficult tasks (ie anything from cleaning their room to doing their homework) and understand where the struggles lie. Walk along and "do the hard thing" with them. Keep in mind "will vs. skill"- if they CAN do well, they WILL do well!
- Predictability = safety. Often times, a child who struggles with "manipulation" or "control" is really just trying to calm their brain stem and make things more predictable for themselves. Structure, routine, and rhythm are so important!
